

Include Figure 1

A semiconductor laser arranged to emit at a given wavelength has a light emitting facet carrying a phase-shifting anti-reflection coating, whose thickness is one quarter that of the given wavelength. Coupling at the light emitting facet is arranged to take place at the minimum of the standing wave.